

Michigan House of Representatives to Vote on Adult Changing Table Implementation

The Michigan House of Representatives just introduced a bill that would require establishments to have adult-sized changing tables in their restrooms. This follows a campaign called Changing Spaces, that brought awareness to the need for adult-sized changing tables for adults with disabilities, such as hypoxic-ischemic encephalopathy \(HIE\), cerebral palsy \(CP\), developmental disabilities, and others (1).

As of now, the Americans with Disabilities Act \(ADA\) requires that restrooms have an accessible stall. However, this leaves out the needs of many individuals who require a surface on which to change. These people have grown accustomed to using the floor of public restrooms to change themselves: a circumstance that most agree is not ethical.

The bill has been referred to as “Liam’s Law,” named after a Michigan 5-year-old with disabilities (3). This is because the changing tables, though referred to as “adult-sized,” fill a much-needed void in necessary accoutrements for people of many ages. As it stands, changing tables only safely hold up to 20 pounds, so the new changing tables would actually serve children, adults, and elderly people with disabilities (2). The tables would accommodate up to 400 pounds, be height adjustable, and fully automated (4).

Congresswoman Lori Stone spoke in favor of the bill, recalling a paraplegic student she once taught who had to change herself on the ground. “I wanted her to have the privacy and the dignity not to have to change on the floor” (4).

Laws calling for these adult-sized changing tables are already in place in Arizona, California, and New Hampshire.
